Jeff in Venice, Death in Varanasi is, among many other things, a paean to Thomas Mann's Death in Venice and Dyer, in tone, has been able to preserve the tired, end-of-world insouciance of that prior work. Indeed, the beginning of Jeff in Venice contains actual fragments (in translation) from Death in Venice.

'Jeff in Venice, Death in Varanasi' - SFGate

The geography of both Venice and Varanasi in these pages is fairly reliable, I hope, but I have taken some liberties with the art, only one example of which was in the 2003 Biennale: the Africans selling knock-off bags near the Arsenale ticket office were actually part of Fred Wilson's installation at the American Pavilion, 2003.

and Jeff in Venice, Death in Varanasi ‘This novel contrasts an extreme of worldliness (sex and status worries in Venice) with the height of otherworldliness (the burning ghats along the Ganges). Geoff Dyer is the most companionable writer at work today and he gives us an extremely involving guided tour of two cities and a man’s disintegrating self (or, as the Hindus call it, the ‘atman’).’
